I Can't Save You, But I'll Die Trying The American Fire Culture

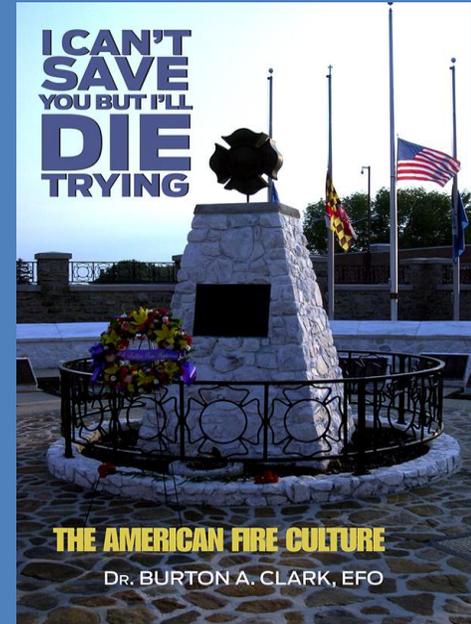

Changing the way society perceives fire death – “When a civilian is killed by fire, it is not an act of God, and when a firefighter is killed, it is not part of the job. When there is a fire death, something went wrong. The public as well as the fire service can all do better to prevent and survive fire.”

Dr. Clark reveals the important changes society must make to provide a more fire-safe environment for firefighters and the public. Including economic, social, technological, and political factors at all levels of society national, state, county, and local.

About Dr. Burton A. Clark, EFO

Burt has been in the fire service for 45 years. He was a firefighter in Washington DC, an Assistant Chief in Laurel MD, and Management Science Chari at the National Fire Academy. In addition to being an NFA Executive Fire Officer Program graduate, Chief Clark hold a BS in Business Administration, an MA in Curriculum and Instruction, and Ed.D. in Adult Education.
